We present empirical results about the performance of the Linux's incorporated stateful packetfilter after we properly tuned it up, how can the connection tracking subsystem be tuned up, and show the effects of tuning the proper settings. We also consider the relations of speed with other hardware capabilities, eg. bus performance, CPU performance and CPU-Memory bandwidth.